
Personal Statements for Law School Application

Contributed by Steven Nofar, Esq.

Resources for the Law School Applicant

Application essay editing - professional services

LSAT discussion forum Â

See how competitive your LSAT and
GPA are at Law Schools

LSAT test prep Â

When you apply to law school you need to submit your college transcripts, an admissions application accompanied with your personal statement, resume, and your LSAT score.Â Laws schools interview prospective students through a studentâ€™s personal statement.Â This is your opportunity to showcase your special attributes, which are not represented in your GPA or LSAT score.Â Therefore, itâ€™s important that you make a great impression with the admissions faculty through your personal statement.Â

{mosloadposition advert1}

Before you get started, read each law school admissionâ€™s application for instructions on essay length and other requirements, such as word count and page limits, spacing requirements, and possible restrictions on topics, if applicable.Â Â Â

Usually, law schools are interested in personal statements which show your unique characteristics, or why you want to attend law school, or how you have overcome adversity or tragedy.Â Itâ€™s a good idea to have your personal statement tell a story which showcases your personal characteristics, rather than just spelling them out for the reader (e.g. âœœI am hardworking, I am willing to learn, etc.âœ•).

Your personal statement should be free of grammatical errors, misspelling or typos.Â In addition, your personal statement should not be a summary of your resume, by simply rewording it.Â Personal statements should have a strong tone and not focus on your weaknesses.Â Also, donâ€™t try to impress the reader with âœœlegal jargonâœ• or modeling your personal statement after a legal brief.Â Therefore, make your personal statement personal.Â A well thought out personal statements can set you apart for your competition and seriously increase your chances of gaining admission to law school.Â

Â Â Â Â